

Should a ticket inspector carry a mobile phone battery pack?

This then tends to lead to the whole, presumably expensive, exercise of filing a report for prosecution. Would a simpler option be for Ticket Inspectors to carry a mobile phone battery pack and offer to lend the pack to the passenger for a fixed fee of say £20, to enable the phone to be woken from the dead and a ticket produced for inspection.

Why can't I produce a ticket on a train?

We have seen many posts where passengers are unable to produce a ticket on a train when asked, because their phone, which held the ticket, has run out of battery. This then tends to lead to the whole, presumably expensive, exercise of filing a report for prosecution.

Are people who run out of battery taking responsibility for themselves?

The assertion that people who run out of battery are not taking responsibility for themselves is ridiculous frankly. Technology can be unpredictable and phones can run out of battery unexpectedly. This then tends to lead to the whole, presumably expensive, exercise of filing a report for prosecution.

What are the benefits of electronic ticketing?

A side benefit of (nearly) all resulting from responsible use of electronic ticketing will be the rapid disappearance of chancers that don't actually have a ticket on their device.
